On the other hand, there is a long-lasting debate about the complex dynamics that social influence in interpersonal interactions generates on the collective level. Mason, Conroy and Smith For one thing, while assimilation seems to be the predominant pattern in interpersonal interactions, people may not only influence each other to become more alike, but also sometimes reject attitudes or behavior of those they interact with, and even seek to become more different from them. Hovland, Harvey and Sherif The complex relationship between social influence as a micro-level process and its macro-consequences for consensus or divisions in society resonates in classic as well as highly contemporary debates in the social sciences.
